

LawBite helpdesk

Portal > Knowledgebase > Legal Advice > Are your documents configurable for Scottish law, or is it sufficient to add a term or change a term indicating that the document is subject to Scots Law?

Are your documents configurable for Scottish law, or is it sufficient to add a term or change a term indicating that the document is subject to Scots Law?

Richard - 2020-09-27 - 0 Comments - in Legal Advice

The two jurisdictions are similar in the area of commercial contracts and services, so our documents would almost certainly be fine for you to use. However, depending on the specifics of the agreements we would advise (whether you use our services or not) to have them checked over just to make sure. We would be more than happy to do this for you if you place a Legal Enquiry. One area where there are some differences is property agreements.